Item No. 1.

Short Title: Discussion with department heads re Compensation Study

Initiated By:

Scheduled Time: 6:30

SUBJECT

RECOMMENDATION

The City Manager and Management Services Director will review with department heads the compensation study methodology and proposed Pay Plan and answer questions from staff and City Council.

BACKGROUND

In a earlier work session regarding the compensation study, the Council agreed the following guidelines would be used to establish pay ranges:

- The market survey group for non-management positions would be public entities of all sizes within the Wasatch Front area.
- The market survey group for management positions would be cities with populations of 10,000 to 30,000 within the Wasatch Front area.
- The 60th percentile of the market survey midpoints would be used as the target for the midpoints of Centerville's new pay ranges.
- Pay range minimums would be 20% below the midpoints and maximums would be 20% above the midpoints, resulting in a maximum that is 44% higher than the minimum. Current pay range breadth is 45%.

The Council also agreed upon a pay range for the City Manager position. Staff and consultant subsequently met and agreed upon a method for determining pay ranges for the other management positions. This will be explained in the work session.

The "Executive Summary" and a 36-page document, "Compensation Analysis and Pay Plan" (see attachments) will be the basis for the presentation and discussion. The "Executive Summary" was recently updated from the one provided earlier to the Council. The update reflects the revised methodology that will be explained during the work session.

City Council received the "Compensation Analysis and Pay Plan" earlier for their February 19 work session. Staff would like to note the following pages for the department heads to review in advance:

- Pages 1-6: Job Valuation documents. If department heads want to better understand how each position was valued, these are the pertinent pages, showing the four main factors and sub-factors used, and a matrix showing the points assigned to each position for each main factor and sub-factor, and total points for each position.
- Pages 26-30: Current pay range comparisons with market. These pages compare Centerville's current pay range minimums, midpoints and maximums with the 60th percentile market target. Page 27 indicates, in general, that midpoints for non-management positions fall below that market target an average of 6.6%, and management positions fall below an average of 18.1%

- Page 34: Proposed Pay Plan. This page shows the Proposed Pay Plan pay ranges and compares midpoints with the current pay ranges. The midpoints of only two Proposed Pay Plan pay ranges fall below the midpoints of current pay plan ranges--$454 below for the Apprentice Mechanic position and $1218 below for the Accounting Tech II position--neither of which are currently used. Please note that all of the positions shown in the Proposed Pay Plan are showing with pay ranges *as if they were full-time positions, even though a few of them are actually part-time positions. Actual pay is based on number of hours worked.
- Pages 35-36: Least Cost Implementation. This table shows that the annual cost of bringing any employees up to the minimum of the new pay ranges is only $3,851. In other words, all but a few of the current employees are paid within the new pay ranges.

Executive Summary
Job Valuation & Compensation Study

Introduction

Pursuant to the approval given by the City Council, Personnel Systems & Services was engaged to address core needs relative to compensation administration, specifically, a "Job Analysis, Classification & Compensation Study". The accepted proposal included these elements: 1) administer a city-wide "job values" survey, 2) conduct employee orientation meetings to explain the job study process and share values survey results, 3) conduct onsite job audits to facilitate the creation of updated job descriptions, 4) create a pay plan alternative to address "Internal Equity" through the development of a job valuation instrument; 5) conduct a labor market survey to determine the competitive position of the city's pay practices, 6) provide implementation strategies identifying impact upon individual employees and budget and 7) explore the impact of an "organizational reset" to address the potential need to mitigate compensation compression".

Preliminary to the project the management team orchestrated the distribution of the "job values survey" to -all employees. This was a perceptual exercise, simply seeking employee opinions regarding various aspects of the "worth of work". The instrument addressed four key elements: 1- the importance ranking of values used to assess comparative worth of jobs, 2- priority rankings of policy and practice related considerations that influence external parity through compensation management, 3- a ranking of the elements common to performance appraisal and viewed as most meaningful by employees, also a ranking exercise, and 4- responses to four "fairness" questions answered with "yes" or "no" that reflect a perception of being or not being underpaid.

Worth of Work Values

The core values to this internal equity instrument consist of Job Knowledge, Responsibility, Difficulty and Work Environment. 41 employees chose to participate in the survey. The average ranking of importance for the various factors, with "1" being highest, for the work values are: Job Knowledge-1.77, Responsibility- 1.77, Difficulty- 2.44 and Work Environment- 2.46. Each primary value is divided into sub-elements, which were also ranked. These rank order preferences were incorporated into the design of the point/job valuation system against which all positions were valued. This process produces a "site validated" internal equity, or job valuation methodology. Of significance is that the internal equity instrument is intended to become a "living" instrument for the administration of pay practices and can be modified to reflect "value-based" enhancements as the city becomes more familiar with the methodology. It is anticipated that the implementation of this values-based methodology will be a "work in progress". The unique outcome from the approach to this study and analysis resulted in a pay administration structure where all jobs have a stand-alone market-based pay range.

Policy Components & External Parity Perceptions

A sampling of various issues and conditions that influence an organization's compensation policies were also ranked as to importance by the employees. That list included the following: Ability to Pay (considering the size and type of business), Organizational Philosophy (willingness to pay, attitudes about ranking among competitors), Regional Economics (prevailing rates and rates of inflation), Availability of Labor Supply (supply and demand, the competition for particular skills and jobs), Reputation of the Organization (competitiveness of pay and market recognition as high or low paying) and Pay Supplements (various incentives and benefits). The order of importance as ranked by the 41 city employee participants was: 1- Organizational Philosophy, 2- Reputation of the City, 3- Regional Economics, 4- Ability to Pay, 5- Pay Supplements, and 6- Labor Supply.

As the city moves forward and considers implementation strategies, reflecting upon these employee priority perceptions can contribute to the assessment and planning process.

Contributory Value Perceptions

This is where the employee provides their opinion about what is most meaningful when being recognized for their contribution to the work place; those things that reflect upon the "worth of the worker". The three aspects of performance recognition are: longevity (years of service or loyalty), efficiency (timely completion of work) and effectiveness (volume & quality of work). The typical expectation is that employees give more attention or pursue most openly recognition for longevity or loyalty to the city as the employer. The sample group's priority ranking reveals a different perspective. First in importance is "effectiveness", being recognized for the quality and volume of work performed. Second in importance, is "efficiency", or being recognized for their timely completion of work and the conservation of resources under their area of responsibility, which includes time, monetary resources, materials and equipment. Third in importance, and last on this short list, is "longevity" or their loyalty to the city as an employee. It is anticipated that these insights can also influence strategic planning and development of the compensation program along with performance standards and objectives.

General Equity & Fairness Perceptions

The final segment of the values survey invited employees to respond to this question: "Do you believe you are underpaid when considering the follow?" This was an anonymous exercise and the intent was to obtain a broad organizational perspective. These are the questions:

1. Do you believe you are underpaid when considering the value of your job to the organization?

2. Do you believe you are underpaid when considering the pay of others within your organization performing essentially the same type of work?

3. Do you believe you are underpaid when considering the amount of work, you perform?

4. Do you believe you are underpaid when considering the pay of others outside your organization performing essentially the same type of work?

To the first question, 38 employees or 92.7% responded "yes". This is an internal equity question. Employees may need to be better informed regarding the methods, process and practices used to establish the worth of the job to the city. Interestingly, of the over 11,791 other public and private sector employees that have completed this survey, 72.9% are of the same opinion. While it may be that this exercise can be used to "vent", we see that Centerville employees are considerably less satisfied with the attention given to the worth of their jobs to the city.

To the second question, 20 employees or 48.8% answered "yes". This question has some interesting interpretative possibilities. One being the possibility that if an employee answers "yes", they may be expressing a frustration that some co-worker(s) are not carrying their fair share of the workload and they are then forced to "carry" that individual without receiving any recognition for their added contribution or greater dedication. This perception can most likely be avoided if the first line supervisors are effective in their role as "evaluator". Consider this axiom: "Success or failure as a manager rests in the ability to evaluate. That ability is the ongoing assessment of things as they were, as they are, and as they need to be resulting in the effective allocation of the resources needed to prevent and solve problems. A problem is a frustrated goal." To this same question, 51.8% of my 11,791 plus employee sample group has also answered "yes". In this instance, Centerville employees are typical.

To the third question, 34 of the 41, or 82.9% of the city employees responding answered "yes". Because doing more with less has most likely been the mode of operation during recent austere times, this may not be too surprising. But it may also be more the norm than the exception that most of the time employees feel over-worked and under paid. Of the over 11,791 employee sample, 68.8% also responded "yes". Because the city's "yes" percentage is considerably larger than the survey average, it is possible that we would find various manifestations of low morale and perhaps even incidents of "Equity Theory" activity or policy abuse revealed through tardiness, absenteeism and attrition. None the less, this perception may also be mitigated by quality performance management and recognition. It is also a possibility that this perception could be indicative of a staffing shortage in some areas; particularly if vacancies have been left unfilled since the tough economic periods.

To the final and fourth question, 41 employees, or 100% answered "yes". While the expectation is that a clear majority of employees will believe the "grass is always greener on the other side"; Centerville employees, by a 37% margin, are less satisfied with where the city competes in the market place. 73.1% of the over 11,791 sample survey responders were of the same opinion. If more competitive pay were in fact a major motivating issue for all 100%, it would be expected that the city would have above average attrition rates, even the swinging-door effect.

Job Evaluation & Internal Equity

Using the instrument developed based upon the results of the work values survey, described above; each position was valued and assigned "job value points". It is the point system that will ultimately establish the job's price tag. This is the process followed:

1. The consultant-revised job descriptions were subsequently reviewed and edited by city staff. A comprehensive review performed by the City Manager and Management Services Director

2. The consultant performed the initial point factor/value analysis of all city jobs using the approved job descriptions.

3. Next, reviewing the consultant's first round results, the management team performed a general sweep of the relationships acting as subject matter experts for the city and also involved department heads in the exercise. This review yielded the verification of job description content and minimum qualifications, some of which produced adjustments to the internal job valuations.

4. Based upon the results of these levels of review, the market analysis phase was entered to test the question "to what degree does the market agree with the assigned job values"; which is a statistical exercise. By using the Worth-of Work (WOW), No Pay Grade approach every job in the city can have a unique and separate pay range tied directly to the market. Contained in the final project workbook are multiple illustrations for the comparison outcomes for minimum pay practices, maximum pay practices, average current pay practices and other "pictures" of the compensation landscape.

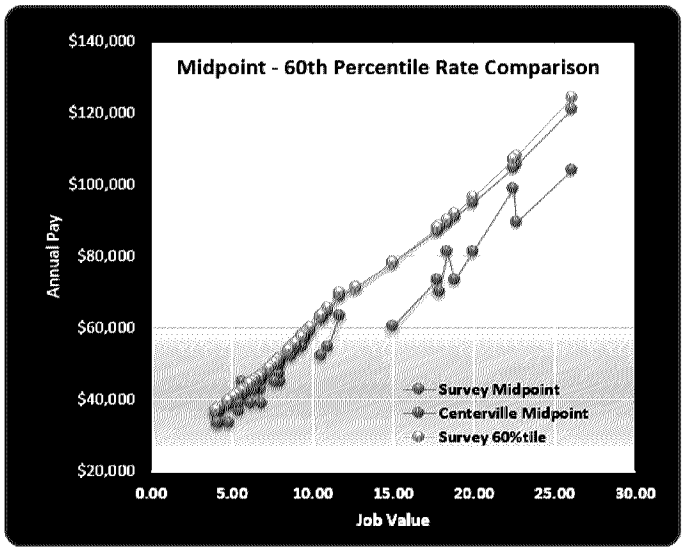
5. Additionally, based upon administration knowledge of organizational challenges, recruitment issues, market sensitive concerns, local economics and related compensation issues, administration initially directed the consultant to establish pay plan control rates at 50% and 75% of the survey group statistical midpoints. Different versions of the analysis included a statewide sampling of cities, a comparison of cities on the Wasatch Front (Box Elder County to Utah County), and a modified Wasatch Front version removing large entities from the executive/department head job matches. The City Council later decided to establish the pay plan control rate at 60% of the survey group statistical midpoints.

Salary Information & Market Comparability

The salary data utilized in the final market analysis was obtained from the "Technology Net Compensation Survey System" and included cities, counties and special service districts within the Wasatch Front area, regardless of size, for non-management positions. For management positions, however, the City Council decided the sample group would include only those entities with populations of 10,000 to 30,000.

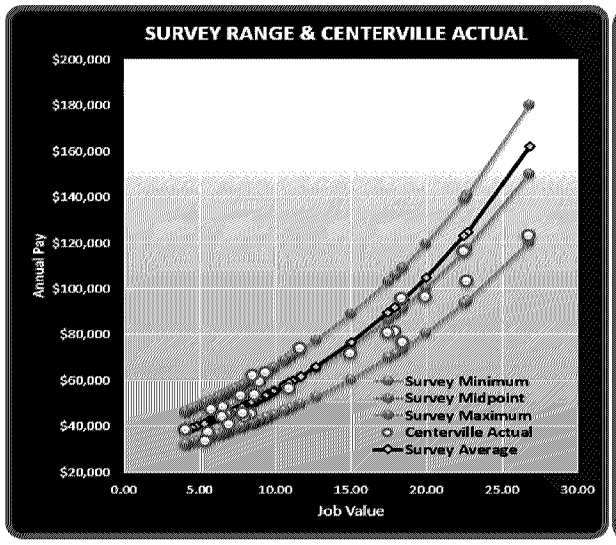
Pay Practice- Control Rate Comparison

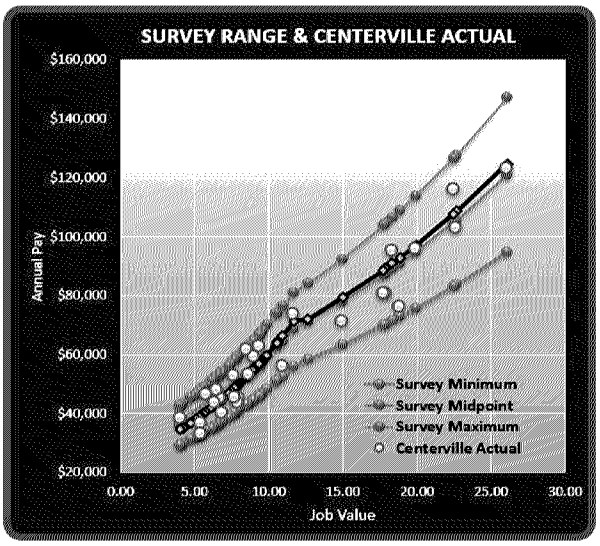
Comparing the current midpoint pay of the city with the 60th percentile of the midpoints of the respective survey groups revealed that current midpoints for non-management positions fall below the market an average of 6.6%, and management positions fall below an average of 18.1%. Additionally, City Council established a target pay range for City Manager, fixing the job's control rate. Based upon this fixed range for City Manager, the statistical analysis was modified for the managerial jobs as illustrated below.



Pay Range Practices & Actual Pay

This graph illustrates the city's actual pay practices in relation to survey group's average official pay range. The expectation is that employers will manage pay progression through the formal pay range aggressively toward the midpoint of the pay plan. As employers maintain a market-based pay plan, those employees whose competencies merit advancement to the midpoint of the ranges will be competitively compensated. The illustration at the right, below, incorporates the impact of anchoring the trend in the pay line to the City Manager's proposed pay range.





Pay Range Management

The establishment of the pay range, the spread or distance between the minimum and the maximum is very arbitrary. Some organizations create standardized ranges which are the same from the lowest valued job to the highest. Another approach is to "staircase" the ranges so that as jobs increase in level of responsibility and difficulty and take on more of a "career" oriented status, the ranges increase. From the survey data, we discover that the average pay range of the survey group is just above 45%. Applying this trend to the design in the proposed pay plan resulted in the pay range strategy shown below, a 44% range based upon 20% adjustments to establish the minimum and maximum for each pay range.

With regard to pay range administration, an issue in most organizations relates to the number of city employees that are "topped out" on the pay ranges. While this represents a frustration for those individuals, especially for those that have been there for a seemingly long period; the fiscally responsible question needing to be asked is, "When does the city's pay plan reach the level of marginal utility?" That point in time when it makes no sense at all to pay any more money for the defined job functions. That point in time when it becomes difficult to identify that the return on the investment is consistent with public needs and expectations. There are two facets to the question. One addresses the worth of the work and the other the worth of the worker. If the city's pay plan is to be market competitive, the worth of the work objectives is being fairly addressed. If pay progression and advancement through the pay range is keeping pace with the speed of learning and the quality of contribution, then the worth of the worker is being recognized.

Job Families/Career Path

During the discussion addressing the design of job families some consideration was given to the creation of various career paths or career progression opportunities. Further attention to the use of job families would focus on what constitutes a logical and meaningful "path" along with having formal levels in a job valuation system, i.e., Police Officer I, II, Maintenance Operator I, II, III, Lead, etc. A true career path is most easily established when there are legitimate requirements for advancement above just "time in service". Legitimate requirements are easily identified where functions are regulated such as with law enforcement, utility operations levels of certifications, building inspector licenses, etc. In terms of administration, trying to defend the legitimacy of advancement criteria when attempting to build artificial career paths may result in frustrations for managers and at other times may be used as a ploy to pursue pay increases for favored employees. These artificial paths also tend to be a version of "seniority compensation". The most defensible and cleanest approach is to limit career path job families to well established and regulated jobs and then be consistent in how employees are advanced through the pay ranges of all other jobs as the employee demonstrates increasing levels of competence. This is further addressed under the "Pay Progression" heading.

Having said that, there is one benefit for establishing even the artificial career path or classification family. Using such an approach, even if only based upon "time in service", can help minimize the potential for new hire pay compression, if it is a legitimate and recognized issue.

Pay Progression

In terms of pay progression management, many organizations target a certain pay rate on their pay plan as a control rate and attempt to manage performance to allow employees to achieve between 90% to 105% of that value within some time frame (four to five years for example), called a Compa-ratio. Compa-ratio refers to the percentage which employee actual pay represents the target or control rate (often the midpoint of the pay range). Pay increases beyond the control rate/midpoint then become contingent upon exemplary performance, longevity and other specific criteria. The midpoint is generally considered market competitive. When considering implementation options, the city may want to consider employee compa-ratios when making placement on a new pay plan. Employees, who have been performing within the same job classification for four to five years, or longer, should possess job competencies sufficient to justify pay which is 90%-105% of midpoint, assuming that performance is at least standard.

Pay Compression

There are two common pay compression concerns that impact organizations when, for whatever reason, the pay practices become "stalled" or when other pay anomalies wiggle themselves into the structure. Type 1 is the compression that occurs when subordinate pay rates creep up near the pay of their immediate supervisor or manager. It is not necessarily a debilitating issue unless the organization is striving to develop in-house talent or engage in succession planning.

If we were to spot check supervisor/subordinate compression within the city pay structure the expectation is that most relationships would be close to a "rule of thumb", a 15% margin. However, if there are some where only a single digit percentage separates the supervisor and subordinate, this would be worthy of some examination. These are potential red flags. The "compression test" exercise is recommended to be an ongoing monitoring effort in HR. A rule of thumb I have used over the years is 15%. If the managers pay is not at least 15% greater than the next highest paid subordinate, there is not going to be much motivation for the subordinate to groom themselves for all the extra grief. To further expand on the compression issue, a look at what I will consider "Type 2" compression, the following has been written by Beverly N. Dance, found as an HR web article.

Pay Compression: What Is It?

Compression is when you have small differences in pay regardless of experience, skills, level, or seniority. You see this when the starting salaries for your new employees in a particular job title are too close to the wages of your existing workers. In awful circumstances, the starting salaries might even exceed what your current employees are earning.

Pay Compression: What Causes It?

There are two main causes of compression. The first is when supply and demand is out of sync, when the need for a particular skill set exceeds the availability. Nurses, software engineers and public employer building inspectors come to mind as recent examples. The second cause can be when your internal compensation structure becomes stale and out of alignment with the external market data.

Pay Compression: Consequences of Not Dealing with It

The obvious problem with compression is the negative impact it has on the morale of your work force. Who wants to welcome a new hire to the team when you learn that that person is already earning more than you? Who wants to fully share company knowledge and have that co-worker successful if resentment over pay is an issue?

Too many companies in this economy are relying on the current high unemployment rates as their de facto retention strategy. Once the economy picks up, if you have not addressed compression issues, it will be your best performers, not your mediocre or troublesome ones, who race to join your competitors.

Even prior to starting their search for an employer who will pay the current market rate for their skill sets, employees who are on the negative side of the compression issue may utilize a passive flight by giving you the bare minimum of effort to get by with absolutely minimal engagement.

Pay Compression: How Do You Deal With It?

Telling employees not to talk about their pay is not a policy option. By doing so you would put your organization in violation of the National Labor Nations Act (NLRA). The National Labor Relations Board enforces the NLRA even when there is no union presence.

So, the answer is to open the corporate pocket book and pay your current employees more money. "But we can't afford that!" is your response? What would you have to pay for their replacements if they walk? How would you come up with that money?

If you are in the situation of compression because the funds have just not been available, honest talk about what individuals are paid and a plan on how to make adjustments over time can help. Create a schedule and then keep your word and implement it.

Another option is to ask what can help with an individual's loyalty other than pay? Sometimes this could be a mentoring or developmental opportunity or a more flexible work schedule to coach a little league team each Tuesday and Thursday at 4:00 p.m. Explore your options with extreme creativity.

One more approach is to re-think your job design. Do you have 10 employees spending half their time on that critical hard to find skill? Could you change the essential responsibilities and instead get by with five or six employees using that skill all of the time?

Pay Compression: How Do You Avoid It?

Forecast ahead and anticipate what your future hiring needs will be. Keep a regular eye on market changes by reviewing market surveys for your key positions and steadily adjust your pay ranges as needed. Usually annual is often enough, but your recruiters can give you early feedback on positions that are moving more quickly in the marketplace. Using job design as a tool may help reduce the number of positions that are influenced by compression, which won't avoid it, but can limit its impact.

(Beverly N. Dance, MBA, SPHR-CA, CCP, CEBS)

While exploring the Beverly Dance perspective on compression, consider these three observations:

Observation #1: If all aspects of the employment relationship and compensation are to be acknowledged, the city utilizes a common practice to recognize the worth of the worker, their loyalty, which is the annual vacation accrual and various non-worked-paid-time-off programs. The bottom-line is that there is expected to be some natural compression mitigation resulting from a city's leave accrual policy and practice. The acquisition of seniority results in an increase in the rate of vacation and sick leave accrual. Every 12 days of accrued annual leave, non-worked paid time, equates to a 4.6% pay increase. If employees on average use six paid sick leave days per year, this use translates into an additional increase of 2.3%. This non-worked paid time drives up the hourly cost of the senior employees and creates some "reality separation" in the value of their pay. The new hires do not enjoy the same level of benefits.

Observation #2: How long does it take for compression to evaporate? The compression perception occurs when the newly hired junior workers performing the same job as senior workers are being compensated near, the same, and perhaps better, than the senior workers. At that point not only is there a significant difference in their time on the job but also a significant difference in their position on the "learning curve" and their ability to make a more meaningful contribution through job performance. Eventually, the learning curve flattens out. The senior worker's knowledge, skills and abilities level off. Also, eventually the junior worker completes the same learning curve and now the job knowledge gap is closed. Both the senior worker and junior worker will eventually be performing the job equally well. Now, theoretically, based upon the worth of the work, both can be paid the same. The claim on base pay compression has evaporated if their pay has been equalized based upon their competencies. For a period of time the senior employee will enjoy the better total compensation, referring to observation #1, but eventually the junior employee will end up in the same leave accrual bracket and then all things are equal in the workplace, and that is okay.

Observation #3: Quality performance management promotes compression.

Implementation

As the city considers a strategy for implementation it will come down to three primary factors; 1- willingness to pay, 2- the ability to pay, and 3- the need to pay. These three issues will be defined in relation to the market information of this study. There are four basic postures to consider when establishing the organizations pay objectives: 1- trendsetter, 2- competitive, 3-parity, and 4- comparable. To be competitive suggests a pay objective above average or parity. Comparability can still be argued when paying below parity if other aspects of the employment and compensation program (city paid benefits) strengthen the employee and management perception of "fairness".

As a cost for implementation is calculated, the least cost implementation strategy is accomplished by placing each employee at a rate on the recommended pay range that is at least equal to his or her current rate of pay. Only employees whose current rate falls below the recommended starting rate are identified for increases. At this point it becomes a management option to factor back into the implementation strategy a method for recognizing performance, time in service, job knowledge and other pertinent aspects of the employee's work history. If the city desires to initiate a program that targets a specific compa-ratio, this would be a good time to begin. You may want to consider additional adjustments for employees who are considered full performance or fully competent workers but fall below the midpoint of the pay range.

Within the job study workbook, in the "Least Cost" implementation table, methodology has been included to use formulas and award additional compensation based upon time in position as well as recognize "added-value" prior experience. This additional pay consideration does also "reset" the organization, mitigating most compression perceptions.

Summary Conclusions

- Centerville City current pay ranges need adjusting to be more competitive, from top (trailing as much as 8% to 29%) to bottom of the pay structure (trailing by .2% to 18%). This is also a shift in pay plan design impacting all city jobs constituting a paradigm shift.

- This new structure will impact recruitment strategies, control rates in pay ranges and long-range career planning for tenured employees.

- By restructuring individualized pay ranges, Centerville can restore workforce perceptions of fairness.

- An internal equity methodology based upon the Equal Pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and the "site validating" values survey has been created. Management Services/Human Resources will be exploring further the "best practice" options for its use.

- An innovative approach to pay administration which utilizes internal equity relationships, also based upon the values instrument, has been delivered as part of the implementation strategy and the ongoing methodology for pay equity administration.

- Consider the recommended rule of thumb for pay separation between managers and supervisors and supervisors and next highest paid subordinate to be 15%. Here too, case-by-case examination is required as an ongoing practice.

- Initial "Least Cost" Implementation Costs will vary, depending upon the market version ultimately adopted by city council.

Basis of Sound Pay Programs

In connection with the results of this study and as the city evaluates the impact of change upon the existing or proposed budgets; your effort to maintain an effective compensation program will be influenced by your philosophy related to some or all the following (converted to policy):

1. Size and type of business: The ability to pay certain rates, based upon revenues and financial resources.

2. Organizational Philosophy: The willingness to pay certain rates and attitudes about ranking among other employers within a selected labor market or among survey participants.

3. Nature and Diversity of Work: The degree of specialization, work variety, and technology (an element of the job classification methodology).

4. Regional Economics: The prevailing rates of pay and the rates of inflation.

5. Availability of Labor Supply: The competition for certain types of jobs resulting from an abundance or shortage of certain skills and abilities within the labor market.

6. Value of Work Contribution: The worth of a job to the organization (the overall value determined through classification methodology).

7. Organization of Labor: The forced inflation of certain pay rates. The degree of recognition provided to unions or associations.

8. Pay Supplements: The total compensation comparability afforded through various incentives and discretionary benefits.

9. Reputation of the Organization: The competitiveness of pay and social recognition as high- or low-paying.

10. Pay Progression Policy:
    - The learning curve impact associated with certain types of jobs.
    - Pay range uniformity vs. diversity (pay schedule design).
    - Length of Service.
    - Performance based increases.
    - Pay for knowledge or level of competency.
    - The use of "control rates" within the pay ranges.

11. Bonus and Incentive Plans:
    - The use of "non-scheduled" recognition.
    - The use of non-monetary rewards.

12. Contributory Value:
    - The perceived value of the individual to the organization. This perceived value is based upon several observable and measurable criteria normally associated with a formal performance management program consisting of individual performance plans, performance monitoring and performance evaluations. This formal approach justifies and documents the decisions which are made about pay progression and job promotions.

Comment: This illustration may actually be the most revealing. The expectation prior to the analysis was that the average current pay of city employees would likely fall somewhere within the survey range. This expectation was generally validated. The trend indicates that current city pay is consistent with market prevailing pay practices in terms of formal pay structure and career income earning opportunities. Because the majority of employees' current pay falls within the market range the question is raised with regard to the compa-ratio. Most pay progression strategies promote advancing employees to the midpoint within a time frame that mirrors the learning curve for the job and it is generally expected that employees that have 4-5 years of experience in the position would have progressed to the midpoint if performance meets expectations.

Comment: This illustration may actually be the most revealing. The expectation prior to the analysis was that the average current pay of city employees would likely fall somewhere within the survey range. This expectation was generally validated. The trend indicates that current city pay is consistent with market prevailing pay practices in terms of formal pay structure and career income earning opportunities. Because the majority of employees' current pay falls within the market range the question is raised with regard to the compa-ratio. Most pay progression strategies promote advancing employees to the midpoint within a time frame that mirrors the learning curve for the job and it is generally expected that employees that have 4-5 years of experience in the position would have progressed to the midpoint if performance meets expectations.
